University of Delhi

Anthropology is a discipline that has long been committed to the understanding of diverse populations, cultures and societies acknowledging the continuum of variations in both past and present. In a rapidly changing world, due to technological advancements, there is a growing need of biosocial understanding of people at regular intervals of time, for governments, municipal bodies, businesses or corporate houses, etc. for making informed decisions. Moreover, the expertise of anthropology in connecting global issues with local problems through ethnographic research can aid in uncovering important aspects of human life that are hitherto unknown to the policy makers. Nowadays even the researchers of other disciplines are also using the anthropological strategies and perspectives for comprehending the ongoing changes in societies, within their respective domains. The Department of Anthropology at Delhi University, since its inception in 1947, has played seminal role in spreading core interdisciplinary values of anthropology through its academic activities. Today, the Department is engaged in incorporating newer methods/dimensions of public health, epidemiology, development and planning research, genome research, new archaeology and public policy for studying populations or ethnic groups. The aim of this national seminar is to focus on acceptable and affordable anthropological solutions and also on the need of fundamental research in response to the challenges faced by communities across the world.
